Every great conception of poet or painter is held and treated by this faculty [imagination penetrative]. Every character that is so much as touched by men like Æschylus, Homer, Dante, or Shakspeare, is by them held by the heart; and every circumstance or sentence of their being, speaking, or seeming, is seized by process from within, and is referred to that inner secret spring of which the hold is never lost for an instant. RUSKIN Modern Painters vol. ii, pt. iii, § 2, ch. 3, p. 162. [W. & S. '58.]

The recognized poet is one who gives voice, in expressive language, to the common thought and feeling which lie deeper than ordinary speech.

The elements of poetry of the highest type are esthetic idea, esthetic form and diction, and esthetic and artistic construction — the first constituting its substance or material, the second its literary form or body, and the third its spirit and essence. Failing this, there may be verse, rime, and meter, but not poetry. — Antonyms: prose.

—Pointed architecture (very commonly but incorrectly called Gothic architecture), the final type assumed by the European architecture of the middle ages, in the course of its unbroken development from Roman architecture, in which it attained artistic and constructive perfection, and then through overrefinement and research for exaggerated effects became corrupted, when at last it gave place about the beginning of the 16th century (earlier in Italy, and later in Great Britain, Germany, and northern Europe) to Renaissance architecture. As indicated by the name, the most striking characteristic of the style is its consistent use of the pointed arch, with details to correspond. The great advance represented by the superseding of the round by the pointed arch lies in the fact that the latter lends itself freely to the solution of all the complicated problems of vaulting, and is at the same time more stable. The ideal Pointed building, as exemplified in a church or similar structure, is constructively an assemblage of groined vaults resting on piers and supported laterally by buttresses, and with the intervals between the exterior piers and arches occupied by windows taking up as nearly as possible all the space and by light walls which have no function in upholding the main structure. The style, however, is highly flexible, and produced not only splendid churches, but fortresses and domestic structures all admirably adapted to their purposes. It approached perfection most nearly in France, about the middle of the 13th century, but presents countless local and national varieties. In Italy the style was never constructively understood, though some of its superficial forms received an original and charming development, and in Germany the forms and to a considerable extent the construction of the preceding style, the Romanesque, continued very generally in popular favor throughout the period when the Pointed flourished in neighboring lands, and until the time of the Renaissance. In its beginnings the style was very plain and simple, the chief efforts of the architects being directed to mastery of problems of construction, and many of the buildings of this time are of great dignity. When difficulties of construction were finally solved, attention was turned to multiplication of ornament and to elaboration, in which, after much very beautiful work had been done, the style finally sank and became merged in the Renaissance. For some of the various styles, see DECORATED; EARLY ENGLISH; ELIZABETHAN; FLAMBOYANT; FLORID; GEOMETRICAL; ITALIAN GOTHIC; JACOBEAN; PERPENDICULAR; TRANSITION; TUDOR. Compare GOTHIC. See plate of ARCHITECTURE, fig. 6.—p. box (Mining), one of a series of inverted pyramidal boxes used in ore-dressing; a V vat.

The second include blue vitriol, calomel, carbolic acid, copper salts, corrosive sublimate, creosote, green vitriol, mercury salts, verdigris, and the like, for which white of eggs, milk or flour and water, or stimulants should be administered. The third include coal-gas, illuminating-gas, sewer-gas, etc., for which fresh air, artificial respiration, oxygen, and electricity are used.

In case of poisoning, if the poison is mineral, or vegetable, besides administering proper antidotes, the stomach and intestines should be speedily emptied and repeatedly washed out. The stomach-pump, siphon, emetics, and purgatives are efficient means. Where poisonous gases have been inhaled, artificial respiration of air, oxygen, or nitrous oxid should be used. In certain cases, as in opium-poisoning, violent muscular exercise, electrical and other stimuli should be resorted to.

po'lar, n. Geom. A plane curve derived from another plane curve by operating on the equation of the latter in trilinear coordinates with the operator $x'\frac{d}{dx}+y'\frac{d}{dy}+z'\frac{d}{dz}$ the primed letters being the coordinates of an arbitrary fixed point taken as a pole. The curve thus found is said to be the polar of the point to (or with respect to) the curve from which it is derived. According to the number of times the symbol is used as an operator, the result is called a first polar, second polar, etc. The first polar to a curve cuts the curve at all the points where tangents drawn from the pole touch it. The polar of a conic section is the right line through the points of contact of the two tangents from the pole to the conic section.

la, aperture to admit light. p, polarizer; d, disk, half of right-handed and half of left-handed quartz; l, liquid to be examined; q, plate of quartz. b, double quartz plate (with rotatory power opposite to q), whose thickness can be varied by the screw; t, lenses for adjusting the instrument to the tint to which the observer's eye is most sensitive; a, analyzer. If the liquid l has no rotatory power, both halves of the double disk (d), when observed through a thickness of b that exactly balances q, appear of the same tint. If it has rotatory power, the halves appear of different tints, and the degree is measured by the alteration of thickness of b necessary to counteract it and make the halves again uniform.

It is of various forms, but consists essentially of a polarizer for polarizing the light (as a Nicol prism or reflecting plate) and an analyzer by means of which it is observed, usually after passing through some medium to be experimented upon. The polaristrobometer and saccharimeter are special forms. See POLARIZATION.

The degree of the deflection depends on the amount of sugar in the liquid. So accurate is this that for years our Government has employed the polariscope for analyzing the sugar imported to this country. R. O. DOREMUS in Homiletic Review Feb., '92, p. 110.

po″lar-i-za′tion, pō″lar-i-zē′shun, n. 1. The act of polarizing, or the state of being polarized; bestowal or acquisition of polarity. 2. Optics. A condition of radiant energy, most noticeable in light, in which some of its properties, especially capacity for transmission and reflection, are different in different directions.

Light may be polarized (1) by reflection, at an angle which differs for different substances, or (2) by transmission, as (a) through most crystals, or (b) obliquely through a bundle of sheets of glass. If light thus treated be examined by subjecting it to such reflection or transmission a second time, it is found that in certain positions of the reflector or crystal it will pass most easily, while in the positions at right angles to these it will be totally quenched, and in intermediate positions it will pass partially. The received explanation depends on the undulatory theory, according to which light fully polarized consists of vibrations (transverse to the direction of the ray) all in one plane, while common light has transverse vibrations in all planes. Certain substances (probably owing to molecular structure) are transparent to vibrations in one plane, and opaque to those in the plane at right angles to this, so that in transmitting the light those vibrations are selected to which this plane corresponds. The plane of polarization is altered or rotated by the passage of polarized light through a quartz crystal or through solutions of various substances, by reflection from a magnetic pole, or by transmission through a medium in a magnetic field. Such rotation is called rotary polarization. After reflection from a metal, light exhibits phenomena which make it probable that its vibrations are in closed curves rather than straight lines. Its polarization is then said to be circular or elliptic, as the case may be. Owing to interference (see INTERFERENCE), anisotropic media, as crystals, show remarkable colors when polarized light is passed through them, and it is hence valuable in the investigation of rock-structure or of internal strains in transparent objects. Rotary polarization is made use of in the saccharimeter and similar instruments. See POLARISCOPE; SACCHARIMETER. Radiant heat and electromagnetic radiation may be polarized in the same way as light.

Malus was so imbued with the corpuscular theory of light that he named this phenomenon polarization, holding it as inexplicable on the wave theory, and as requiring a species of polarity (akin to the magnetic) in the light-corpuscles.

The principal schools distinguished are the following: Austrian school (the latest, which gives especial attention to the facts of social life, of natural science, and of modern psychology, considering man as man), historical (comparatively recent, originating with Roscher of Germany, which discards the abstract method, studies economic conditions in every period and country, emphasizes a continuous and inevitable development, and regards the most stable elements of economics as variable), mercantile (a bygone single phase rather than a system, which made it the end of all regulation to obtain and amass the precious metals as the only true wealth of a country), national (best represented by List of Germany and Carey of America, which gives especial prominence to the interests of a nation to be promoted, as against foreign competition, and hence favors a protective-tariff system), orthodox or classical (first fully set forth by Adam Smith, which, though appealing to low motives, looked to individual and cosmopolitan interests, especially to individual liberty, and hence took in and developed the physiocratic doctrine of free trade among nations), and physiocratic (see PHYSIOCRACY). The poppies are showy herbs of the Old World, a few species being cultivated and sparingly naturalized in the New. Their solitary axillary flower-stalks are terminated by a nodding bud becoming erect in flower and fruit. The flower consists of 2 or 3 concave caducous sepals, 4 or 6 white, red, yellow, or violet petals, numerous stamens, and a one-celled capsule covered by the broad radiating compound stigma. The white juice abounds in opium, and is the source of that article in commerce. The species most employed is the opium-poppy (P. somniferum), with white flowers, which has been cultivated from remote antiquity, its native country being unknown. See OPIUM.

The Government of China, being desirous to prevent the use of Opium, in 1839 destroyed a great quantity, the property of British merchants, which led to the first war with that country; the result being the opening of that great empire, as also Japan, to the trade and commerce of the world. The Poppy, therefore, with the tea, sugar, tobacco, and cotton plants, has been an important agent in changing the political and social conditions of nations.

porce'lain[1], pōrs'lēn (XIII), n. A translucent kind of pottery, usually glazed, existing in many varieties, according to its composition and method of manufacture, but generally characterized by a glassy fracture, clear ring when struck, homogeneity throughout its thickness, and resistance to fire, water, and all acids but hydrofluoric.

The history of porcelain dates from the manufacture of hard porcelain from kaolin in China during the Han dynasty (206 B. C. to A. D. 25). The several dynasties were famed for some special color of porcelain, as the Tsin (A. D. 265–419) for blue, the Suy (581–618) for green, etc., decorative painting not coming into use until the Yuen dynasty (1260–1368). Few specimens of Chinese porcelain are older than the reign of Kang-he (1661–1721), many with earlier marks being forgeries. Porcelain-manufacture was introduced into Japan from China about 1513. Attempts at its imitation in Europe resulted in the production of a translucent porcelain in Venice in 1470, no specimens of which are known. A translucent ware called Medici porcelain was made in Florence in 1575–'80. Subsequent experiments conducted in France resulted in the discovery of the so-called artificial soft porcelain in St. Cloud in 1695, by Chicanneau. Other French factories famous for this ware are Vincennes (1745–'56) and Sèvres (1756 to date). True hard porcelain was originally made by Friedrich Böttger in Meissen, Saxony, in 1707. The secret of its manufacture soon spread, and factories were established in Vienna (1720), Berlin (1751), St. Petersburg (1758), and Sèvres (1765).

Porcelain includes chiefly three varieties — (1) hard porcelain, (2) natural soft porcelain, and (3) artificial soft porcelain. For distinctions, see POTTERY.

Among the more noted varieties of hard porcelain are the following: Amstel, Holland (1782–1810); Arita (see JAPANESE, below); Berlin, Prussia, called also Royal Berlin (1751 to date); Brandenburg, Prussia (1713–'19); Bristol, England (see COOKWORTHY); Budweis, Bohemia (modern); Caen, France (1793 to about 1800); Capo di Monte, Naples, Italy (1736–1821); Chantilly, France (1736); Cookworthy, made by William Cookworthy in Plymouth (1768–'71) and Bristol (1773–'81), England; Copenhagen, Denmark (1760 to date); Dresden, Saxony, called also Meissen and Royal Saxon (1707 to date); Hizen (see JAPANESE, below); Imari (see JAPANESE); Japanese, chiefly from potteries in Arita and Imari, province of Hizen, hence called Hizen porcelain and Kioto porcelain; Kioto (see JAPANESE); Kiyomidzu (see JAPANESE); Limoges, France (1779 to date); Lowestoft, England (1789–1802); Meissen (see DRESDEN); Royal Berlin (see BERLIN); Royal Saxon (see DRESDEN); Sèvres, France (1765 to date); Swansea, Wales (1804–'20); Vienna (1720 to date).

Among the more noted varieties of natural soft porcelain are the following: Bow, London, England (1744–'75); Chelsea, England (1745–'84); Derby, England (1750–1848); Crown Derby being a variety made subsequent to 1784, and Derby Crown a modern imitation); Swansea, Wales (1817–'20); Worcester, England (1751 to date; called Royal Worcester subsequent to 1788).

The noted varieties of the artificial soft porcelain are the following: Chantilly, France (1735–1803); Limoges, France (1773); Lunéville, France, and Sèvres, France (1756).

The contractions and expansions resulting from variations of temperature are due to the existence of physical pores, whilst in the organic world the sensible pores are the seat of the phenomena of exhalation and absorption. In wood, sponge, and a great number of stones -- for instance, pumice-stone -- the sensible pores are apparent; physical pores never are. Yet, since the volume of every body may be diminished, we conclude that all possess physical pores. GANOT Physics tr. by Atkinson, ¶ 13, p. 7. [W. W. '90.]

pos'i-tiv-ism, poz'i-tiv-izm, n. 1. A way of thinking that regards nothing as ascertained or ascertainable beyond the facts of physical science or of sense.

Positivism is, characteristically, not so much a definite philosophy as a method of philosophizing, a way of thinking about science, life, and religion. JOHN TULLOCH Lect. on Renan's Life of Christ lect. i, p. 46. [FOX & H. '65.]

2. Philos. A system of philosophy elaborated in Paris by Auguste Comte (1798–1857), having as its foundation the doctrine that man can have no knowledge of anything but phenomena, and that our knowledge of phenomena is relative, not absolute. It thereby excludes all metaphysics and philosophy, all knowledge of the supernatural, of cause and First Cause, of mind human and divine, and all except empirical knowledge of nature. In Comte's view all knowledge proceeds by three stages: first, the theological, in which phenomena are regarded as due to a supernatural agency; second, the metaphysical, in which they are referred to metaphysical causes; and third, the positive, in which an explanation of phenomena by experience is sought in mere law or the relations of facts. Positivism aims at a classification of sciences by purely experimental and historical methods, and at a sociology having as its ethical basis a utilitarian altruism. Comte attempted later to construct a cult, somewhat analogous to the worship of the Roman Catholic Church, but without recognition of Christian dogma. Thus in effect he returned to his first or theological stage, somewhat after the manner of Vico's (1725) law of cycles. See RICORSI. Compare GNOSIOLOGY; AGNOSTICISM. positive philosophy†.

The second view, that of positivism, regards all inquiry into causes as both fruitless and hopeless.
B. P. BOWNE Metaphysics pt. i, ch. 4, p. 117. [H. '82.]

Positivism in its broad sense includes Comte's development of his philosophy into a theology and a church; a theology which admits neither a revelation nor a God, but inculcates the systematic worship of that gigantic idol representing Humanity at large, or the whole human race, which Hobbes of Malmesbury called 'the Leviathan,' but which is here denominated the 'New Supreme Being.' FRANCIS BOWEN Modern Philosophy ch. 15, p. 265. [S.]

Hence positivism lays of necessity an absolute interdict on all religious speculation.

—possessive case (Eng. Gram.), the case of the noun or pronoun that denotes possession, origin, or the like. Nouns in the possessive case are formed by adding 's to the nominative singular and to irregular plurals, and an apostrophe only to the regular plural; as, John's book; men's souls; boys' shoes. Pronouns in the possessive case have special forms, as my, his, her, its, our, ours, your, yours, their, theirs, whose. By some grammarians possessive nouns and pronouns are called possessive adjectives. The possessive or genitive ending (s > r) was originally adjectival and had many meanings for which it is no longer a living affix; such meanings are often presented in old phrases. In Old English there were several genitive endings, but all have given way to the phrase with the preposition of (the Norman or analytic genitive) except 's, which survives mainly in a few familiar idioms with names of persons; thus, we say John's soul, but the sole of his shoe.

po-ten'tial, n. 1. Anything that may be possible; a possible development.

The potential of subsistence in Europe has not yet been approached. ATKINSON in Century Magazine Jan., '87, p. 427.

2. Gram. The potential mode. 3. Phys. Sci. (1) A condition at a point in space, due to attraction or repulsion near it, in virtue of which something at that point, as a mass or an electric charge, would possess potential energy or the power of doing work: in the case of electricity, measured by the work done in bringing a unit of positive electricity thither from an infinite distance against an electrical repulsive force. (2) In any system of attracting bodies, a mathematical quantity having at each point of space a value equal to the energy acquired by a unit mass in falling from an infinite distance to that point. (3) In such a system, the work that would be done by its members in passing to their present configuration from some standard one, as from separation by infinite distances.

Potential, regarded as something distributed throughout space, determines, by the difference of its values at neighboring points, the intensity and direction of the force acting through the region. Its variation from one point to another thus constitutes or at least measures force, the law being that a material body always tends to move in the direction of increasing potential and a positive electrical charge in that of decreasing potential. The function in the former case is called gravitation-potential, and in the latter electric potential, which is taken with the opposite algebraic sign. Electric potential, which determines the flow of electricity, has been compared to temperature, which similarly governs the flow of heat. The potential due to the earth's attraction in like manner determines level, which governs the flow of water. Potential can exist only when the work done in moving from one place to another does not depend on the path followed. Thus there is no potential for forces like friction or viscosity. The term is sometimes extended to any quantity distributed through space in such a way that its variation represents a vector; for instance, a quantity whose variation represents the velocity in a moving fluid (called velocity-potential).

Whenever two points at different electric potentials are connected by a conductor, a transference of electrification takes place through this conductor, producing an electric current. . . . But if by any device, such as a voltaic cell, the difference of potential be maintained constant, the flow of current is continuous.

2. The manufacture of earthenware or porcelain. 3. Any kind of clay ware molded when in a plastic condition and then hardened by fire.

The art of making pottery has been practised by all peoples, even in the prehistoric ages. Cinerary urns, vessels for holding or cooking food, drinking-vessels, etc., have been found in graves and barrows of both the Old and the New World. These, all of which were baked in an open fire, are usually ornamented with patterns of straight, crossed, or zigzag lines (seldom with wavy or curved lines), stamped into the clay before firing. Pottery is soft pottery when its surface is unglazed and easily scratched by a sharp-pointed piece of iron; hard pottery, when the iron has no effect on it. Between soft earthenware, as represented by a common flower-pot, and hard porcelain, as a Sèvres plate, there are numerous varieties of wares. They may be arranged in three classes and nine subclasses, as follows:

(1) Earthenware, characterized by comparative softness and fusibility in a porcelain-furnace. It includes: (a) Unglazed ware, simply baked clay, as bricks and terra-cotta. (b) Lustrous ware, selected clay baked and coated with slight vitreous glaze, as ancient Greek vases. (c) Glazed ware, ordinary clay ware with a lead glaze, as common household ware. (d) Enameled ware, ordinary clay ware with an opaque (tin enamel) glaze, as Italian majolica.

(2) Stoneware, characterized by hardness and infusibility owing to the silica in the clay forming the body. (a) A siliceous clay, usually light-colored, and generally coated with a vitreous glaze containing lead, as granite-ware. (b) A siliceous clay, generally colored or dark, and usually coated with a salt glaze, as a stoneware crock.

(3) Porcelain, mostly characterized by hardness, almost infusible, with a body of clay containing silica, somewhat translucent, and usually with an alkaline glaze. (a) Hard, a body of kaolin and feldspar with a feldspathic glaze, as Chinese, Sèvres, Berlin, etc., porcelain. (b) Natural soft porcelain, a body of kaolin and calcium phosphate coated with a lead and boric-acid glaze, as Worcester porcelain. (c) Artificial soft porcelain, a body resembling glass consisting chiefly of alkaline salts and coated with a lead glaze, as the early tender porcelain of Sèvres.

VARIETIES OF POTTERY.

The following lists include only the more important varieties of stoneware and earthenware. See PORCELAIN.

ANCIENT POTTERY. The many varieties of ancient earthenware and stoneware known to us by existing specimens are named usually from the country or place of manufacture; as, Arabic (8th to 14th cent., including tiles, mosaics, and vases); Assyrian (Accadian, Babylonian, Chaldean, Mesopotamian, Ninevite, including inscribed bricks and cylinders, wall-ornaments, vases, etc., colored with vitrified enamels or painted); Egyptian and Egypto-Phenician (Canopic, Cypriote, Mycenean, Phenician, Rhodian, Trojan, etc., including wall-slabs and archaic utensils in biscuit, painted or enameled with metallic oxids in brilliant colors); Etruscan (from tombs in Etruria, including wall-decorations, black or red glossy pottery, painted or stamped biscuit, and imitation Greek vases); Hellenic (Attic, Corinthian, Magna-Grecian, Samian, Sicilian, Tanagrine, etc., including yellow clay painted in browns and reds, red glazed and painted with black enamel, and black with red figures, chiefly vases of many forms and figurines); Hispano-Moresque (Majorcan, Minorcan, Rhodian, Sicilian, etc., mostly enameled faïence, Persian in form, color, and ornamentation); Persian (Rhodian, Damascene, including lustered ware, graffito, relief enamels); Phenician, same as Egypto-Phenician; Roman (Aretine, Greco-Roman, Romano-British, Romano-Gaulish, Samian, Saguntine, etc., including glossy red (see SAMIAN), black ware, glazed ware, and decorated in relief).

MODERN POTTERY may be classed as follows, according to the countries of manufacture: England — Bristol, Burslem, Chelsea, Doulton, Fulham, Lambeth, Merton, Wedgwood (bamboo, basalt, jasper, queen's-ware), etc.; France — Avignon, Beauvais, Cognac, Limoges, Luneville, Marseilles, Moustiers, Nancy, Nevers, Oiron (Henri Deux), Paris (Palissy), Quimper, Rouen, Sarreguemines, Savigny, Strasburg, etc.; Germany and the Netherlands — Amsterdam (Amstel), Cologne, Delft, Dresden, Kreussen, Nuremberg, grès de Flandres; Italy — Abruzzi (Castelli), Caffaggiolo, Faenza, Forli, Gubbio, Pavia (graffito), Perugia, Pesaro, Rimini, Rome, Siena, Venice, etc.; Scandinavia — Copenhagen, Marieberg, Rorstrand, Stockholm, etc.; Spain and Portugal — Alcora, Malaga, Puente del Arzobispo, Rato, Talavera, Triana (Seville), Valencia, etc.

American Pottery. Among prehistoric potteries found in America are those called Mexican (Aztec or Toltec, including black and yellow without glaze, often of grotesque form, with painted patterns and geometrical designs); Mound-builders' (found in western mounds, unglazed earthenware, often painted); Peruvian (found in tombs, much like Mexican); Pueblo (unglazed earthenware with painted geometrical decorations).

The first pottery made in the United States was white ware, about 1684. Clay pipes were made about 1690, terra-cotta tiles about 1740, slip-decorated earthenware about 1760 in Pennsylvania, undersglazed decorated white ware in 1770 in Philadelphia, Rockingham in 1839, inlaid floor-tiles in 1853, and architectural terra-cotta about 1870. Recent United States pottery includes white granite, better known as ironstone china (see CHINA), red earthenware (used for umbrella-stands, jardinières, tiles, pie-plates, etc., made of brick-clay, often glazed), yellow ware (for baking-dishes, etc., made of various buff-colored clays), Rockingham ware (see WARE), cream-colored ware (see WARE), semi-porcelain or Paris granite (an imitation porcelain for teasets, etc.). Other United States pottery is named from the place of manufacture, as East Liverpool, Ohio (Rockingham, yellow ware), Trenton, N. J. T. C. MENDENHALL in Proc. A. A. A. S. vol. XXXVII, p. 81. [PUB. BY SEC. '89.]

The old or original English pound was derived from the weight of 7,680 grains of wheat, all taken from the middle of the ears and well dried; hence, "grains" form the lowest fractional parts of a pound. This continued to be the standard pound from William the Conqueror to Henry VIII., in whose reign the avoirdupois pound of 7,000 grains gradually came into use; in the reign of Elizabeth this was established by law, and has continued to be the standard. The avoirdupois pound of 16 ounces is employed in the United States and in England in the weighing of all ordinary commercial commodities; the troy pound of 12 ounces, 5,760 grains, or more commonly its fractions, is the measure employed for weighing bullion, jewels, etc. The troy pound and ounce are used by the United States Pharmacopœia in filling medical prescriptions, while the weights used by the British Pharmacopœia are the imperial or avoirdupois pound, ounce, and grain. The standard British pound at present is a piece of platinum preserved in the office of the Exchequer, at the temperature of 62° Fahr. A number of authorized copies of it have been made and deposited at several institutions.

The English guinea, no longer coined, is reckoned at 21 shillings. See COIN.

I reckon it is an oversight in a great body of metaphysicians that they have been afraid to ascribe our apprehensions of power to intuition. In consequence of this neglect, some never get the idea of power, but merely of succession, within the bare limits of experience. MCCOSH Intuitions bk. i, pt. ii, ch. 2, p. 161. [C. & BROS. The number of times the number is taken is indicated by an exponent (see EXPONENT); thus, $a \times a \times a \times a$ is the fourth power of a and is written a^4. Holman Hunt (1827–), John Millais (1829–), and others, calling themselves the "Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood," which had for its cardinal principle a return to the truth, sincerity, and earnestness that marked the style of the Italian painters before Raffael.

> The aims of the school were a rejection of conventional treatment, adherence to nature, even in the minutest details, devout and romantic feeling, and the restoration of decorative feeling in art. In figure-painting it ran into the archaic mannerism of the time before Raffaello, affecting a stiff conventional formality like decorative patterns, inconsistent with its proper aim.
> Pre-Raphaelitism has but one principle, that of absolute, uncompromising truth in all that it does, obtained by working everything, down to the most minute detail, from nature, and from nature only. Every Pre-Raphaelite landscape background is painted to the last touch, in the open air, from the thing itself. Every Pre-Raphaelite figure, however studied in expression, is a true portrait of some living person. Every minute accessory is painted in the same manner. And one of the chief reasons for the violent opposition with which the school has been attacked by other artists, is the enormous cost of care and labour which such a system demands from those who adopt it, in contradistinction to the present slovenly and imperfect style.
> RUSKIN Lect. on Arch. iv, p. 179. [J. W.]

> The Brotherhood did not last for long. The members drifted from their original principles, each began to paint after his own style, and Pre-Raphaelitism passed away as it had arisen, though not without leaving a powerful stamp on English art, especially in decoration. J. C. VAN DYKE Letter to Stand. Dict. May 21, '94.

Compare CHURCH. See phrases below.

In 1860 the Southern Presbyterian Church withdrew as a consequence of the secession of the Southern States. By the reunion of the Old School and New School branches, in 1870, on the "standards pure and simple," the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America was constituted as it now exists.—Old School P., a member of the conservative branch after the separation of 1838.—Reformed P., see REFORMED.—Scotch P., a member of (1) the Established Church of Scotland, (2) the Free Church, which seceded from it in 1843, or (3) the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. The doctrine of presbytery, as distinguished from prelacy, is that of the parity of ministry, as opposed to distinct orders of the ministry. The doctrine, as distinguished from independency or congregationalism, is that the right government of the church is by presbyteries, made up of ministers or teaching elders, and ruling elders elected by the church-membership (either for life, as formerly in the church generally, or for a term of years, as now in some branches of the church, resulting in the rotary eldership) as their representatives—the particular local church being immediately under the care and control of a session made up of the pastor or pastors and ruling elders of that church, and all the affiliated churches of a district, state, territory, or country under the care and control of ruling elders and ministers in presbyteries, synods, general assemblies, or other bodies, as consistory, classes, etc. See ELDER; PRESBYTER. Synonyms: anticipate, forestall. The original sense of prevent, to come before, act in advance of, which is now practically obsolete, was still in good use when the authorized version of the Bible was made, as appears in such passages as "When Peter was come into the house, Jesus prevented him" (i. e., accosted him first), Matt. xvii, 25; "Thou prevented him with the blessings of goodness" (i. e., by sending the blessings before the desire is formulated or expressed), Ps. xxi, 3. Anticipate is now the only single word usable in this sense: to forestall is to take or act in advance in one's own behalf and to the prejudice or hindrance of another or others, as in the phrase "to forestall the market." But to anticipate is very frequently used in the favorable sense; as, his thoughtful kindness anticipated my wish (i. e., met the wish before it was expressed); or we say "I was about to accost him when he anticipated me"

(by speaking first); or one anticipates a payment (by making it before the time); in neither of these cases could we use forestall or prevent. For the present use of prevent, see synonyms for HINDER; PRECLUDE.

Synonyms: charge, cost, expenditure, expense, outlay, value, worth. The cost of a thing is all that has been expended upon it, whether in discovery, production, refining, decorating, transportation, or otherwise, to bring it to its present condition in the hands of its present possessor: the price of a thing is what the seller asks for it. In regular business, as a rule, the seller's price on his wares must be more than their cost to him; when goods are sold, the price the buyer has paid becomes their cost to himself. In exceptional cases, when goods are sold at cost, the seller's price is made the same as the cost of the goods to him, the cost to the seller and the cost to the buyer becoming then identical. Price always implies that an article is for sale; what a man will not sell he declines to put a price on; hence the significance of the taunting proverb that "every man has his price." Value is the estimated equivalent for an article, whether the article is for sale or not; the market value is what it would bring if exposed for sale in the open market; the intrinsic value is the inherent quality of the article considered by itself alone; the market value of an old and rare volume may be very great, while its intrinsic value may be practically nothing. Value has always more reference to others' estimation, literally, what the thing will avail with others) than worth, which regards the thing in and by itself, thus, intrinsic value is a weaker expression than intrinsic worth. Charge has especial reference to services, expense to minor outlays; as, the charges of a lawyer or physician; traveling expenses, household expenses.

Printing is commonly referred to as "the art preservative of all other arts," since it furnishes the means of recording knowledge for the use of future generations. Printing from blocks was known in China at an early period, and came into use in Europe in the 12th century for ornamenting fabrics. In the 14th century playing-cards were printed. The first real advance in printing was the invention of movable types about the middle of the 15th century. This invention is probably due to Laurens Janszoon Coster, of Haarlem, but Johann Gutenberg, with the aid of Johann Fust and Peter Schoeffer, of Germany, is generally credited with being the first to put it to practical use. The first book printed in English was "The Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye," from the press of William Caxton, of London, about 1475. Printing received a second great impulse with the invention of the cylinder press early in the 19th century, and the application of steam. The old-fashioned hand-press turned out about 200 copies an hour, the cylinder press increased the production to 2,400 an hour, while the web perfecting presses, devised within the last generation, are capable of printing from 5,000 to 100,000 perfected sheets in an hour. The use of movable types is beginning to give way to machines that substitute a line as a unit instead of a letter. See LINOTYPE. Compare LITHOGRAPHY.

The secret of printing must have been discovered many thousands of times before it was used, or could be used. . . . Not, therefore, any want of a printing art, — that is, of an art for multiplying impressions, — but the want of a cheap material for receiving such impressions, was the obstacle to an introduction of printed books, even as early as Pisistratus. DE QUINCY Opium-Eater, Sequel, Palimpsest p. 226. [T. & F. '55.]

print'ing-press", print'ing-pres', n. 1. Same as PRINTING-MACHINE. 2. A mechanism for printing, operating by pressure; as, the Adams printing-press.

Printing-machine and printing-press are used interchangeably, in technical use being usually shortened to press. The most familiar types of printing-presses are: amateur press, a card-press operated by a hand-lever; bed-and-platen p., one on which the form and paper are both on flat surfaces; book-p., a cylinder or Adams press for printing sheets for books (requiring perfection of impression, evenness of color, and accuracy of register); card-p., any lightly built small job-press, suitable for cards and very small work, chromatic p., a multicolor press; copperplate-p., a press consisting of a bed and roller for printing from engraved copperplates (in use for visiting-cards, wedding-invitations, etc.); cylinder p., properly, a printing-machine in which the impressions are made from type or plates laid upon a flat surface (a bed) that usually moves forward and backward, under a rotating impression-cylinder (a drum-cylinder p. has one large cylinder, a double-cylinder p. has two; in a stop-cylinder p. the impression-cylinder stops during the return motion of the bed); 4-, 6-, 8-, or 10-cylinder p., a press having 4, 6, 8, or 10 impression-cylinders printing a like number of sheets at each revolution of the type-cylinder (now superseded by the web perfecting press); double-feeding p., a single-cylinder press arranged so that two sheets may be fed and printed to one complete movement of the bed; duplex p., a two-cylinder web press, printing during both the forward and the reverse movements; eighth-, quarter- (or quarto-), or half-medium p., a job-press that will print a form 8×12, 10×15, or 14×17 inches respectively, or thereabouts; hand-p., a press operated by hand-power, particularly a bed-and-platen press in which the impression is given by a lever; job-p., see JOB; liberty p., a job-printing press in which the bed assumes a nearly horizontal position convenient for corrections, after each impression; lithographic p., a press (usually a cylinder press) arranged to print from a lithographic stone instead of a type-form; multicolor p., a press for printing in several colors at one impression; newspaper-p., any large high-speed press for printing newspapers; perfecting p., a newspaper- or book-press printing on both sides of the sheet, practically at the same time, and usually delivering the sheets folded; platen-p., same as BED-AND-PLATEN PRESS; revolving type-cylinder p., or type-revolving p., a newspaper-press in which the type is wedged into turtles, which are secured to the face of a revolving cylinder; rolling-p., a press for printing engraved plates, in which the plate and bed are passed between a platen and a roller, by the rotation of the latter; turtle-p., a so-called revolving type-cylinder press; two- or three-revolution p., one in which the cylinder revolves two or three times to one impression; web p., a newspaper- or job-press printing from a continuous roll of paper; web perfecting p., a perfecting press that prints from a roll of paper (the kind of machine on which all great newspapers are now printed). They use stereotype plates, run at high speed, and print both sides, folding, pasting, etc., as desired. The speed is practically limited to 24,000 impressions an hour, but by doubling and quadrupling the parts, results as high as 100,000 an hour are attained.

Other printing-presses are named from the manufacturer or inventor; as, Adams p. (a large slow-running bed-and-platen power press, still used in book-printing — the forerunner of the cylinder press), Campbell p. (having a direct-geared impression-cylinder and bed), Gordon p. (a type of job-printing press, characterized by a double-disk ink-table, reciprocating bed and platen, and a dwell on the impression), Hoe p. (see illus.).

In this sense an event has probability if there be any chances at all in its favor, even though the majority of the chances may be against it, and the probability may range from absolute improbability to certainty. The degree of this probability is expressed by comparing the number of the chances favoring an event or supposition either with the total number of chances or with the number supporting the opposite expectation; as, a probability of three to ten.

A Probability-curve.

Distances of points on the horizontal line, measured to the right and left of the center, represent errors of observation in excess and in deficiency respectively. The area of the figure vertically above any section of the base-line represents the probability of the occurrence of an error within that section. The curve expresses the following facts: 1. Errors in excess and in deficiency are equally frequent and probable in a large number of observations, as shown by the symmetry of the curve. 2. In every kind of observation there is a limit which the greatest accidental errors do not exceed, as shown by the curve's approaching the horizontal line at the sides. 3. The errors are not uniformly distributed, but the smaller occur more frequently than the larger, as shown by the greater height of the curve in the middle, close to the vertical axis.

2. To hinder or debar; preclude. [< L. prohibitus, pp. of prohibeo, < pro, before, + habeo, hold.]

Synonyms: debar, disallow, forbid, hinder, inhibit, interdict, preclude, prevent. Debar is said of persons, disallow of acts; one is debarred from anything when shut off as by some irresistible authority or necessity; one is prohibited from an act in express terms; he may be debarred by silent necessity. An act is disallowed by the authority that might have allowed it; the word is especially applied to acts which are done before they are pronounced upon; thus, a government may disallow the act of its commander in the field or its admiral on the high seas. Inhibit and interdict are chiefly known by their ecclesiastical use. As between forbid and prohibit, forbid is less formal and more personal, prohibit more official and judicial, with the implication of readiness to use such force as may be needed to give effect to the enactment; a parent forbids a child to take part in some game or to associate with certain companions; the slave-trade is now prohibited by the leading nations of the world. Many things are prohibited by law which can not be wholly prevented, as gambling and prostitution; on the other hand, things may be prevented which are not prohibited, as the services of religion, the payment of debts, or military conquest. That which is precluded need not be prohibited. Compare ABOLISH; HINDER; PREVENT.—Antonyms: allow, authorize, command, consent to, direct, empower, enjoin, give consent, leave, or permission, let, license, order, permit, put up with, require, sanction, suffer, tolerate, warrant. — Prepositions: an act is prohibited by law; a person is prohibited by law from doing a certain act. Prohibit was formerly construed, as forbid still is, with the infinitive, but the construction with from and the verbal noun has now entirely superseded the older usage.

A Projection of a Winding Stairway.

The position of the vertex relatively to the plane gives rise to various types of projection. (a) In orthographic or parallel projection the vertex is infinitely distant, so that the projecting rays are parallel to each other. (b) In orthogonal p. these parallel lines are perpendicular to the plane of projection. (c) In stereographic p. the vertex is on the surface of a sphere on whose surface lies the figure to be projected (as in making maps), and the plane of projection is at the extremity of the diameter through the vertex and perpendicular to it. This and all the remaining kinds described in this paragraph are called projections of the sphere. (d) In globular p. the vertex is at a distance from the sphere equal to the radius divided by $\sqrt{2}$, and the diameter through the vertex is perpendicular to the plane of projection. (e) In gnomonic p., used in constructing sun-dials, the vertex is at the center of the sphere. (f) In cylindric and conic p. the vertex is at the center of the sphere, and, instead of on a plane, the surface is projected on a cylinder or a cone touching the sphere. (g) In polyconic p. the sphere is divided into narrow zones each of which is projected on the particular cone that is tangent along the central line of that zone. (h) In polar p. the vertex is at the center of the sphere and the plane passes through a polar circle. (i) In Mercator's p. (which is a projection in the third sense defined above — not in the second) the meridians of a sphere are represented by parallel straight lines at equal intervals on the equator, and the parallels of latitude by lines perpendicular to the meridians, and at increasing intervals, so as to preserve the actual ratio between the increments of longitude and latitude at every point. THE LOST ARTS.[1]

Ladies and Gentlemen:

I am to talk to you to-night about "The Lost Arts"—a lecture which has grown under my hand year after year, and which belongs to that first phase of the lyceum system, before it undertook to meddle with political duties or dangerous and angry questions of ethics; when it was merely an academic institution, trying to win busy men back to books, teaching a little science, or repeating some tale of foreign travel, or painting some great representative character, the symbol of his age. I think I can claim a purpose beyond a moment's amusement in this glance at early civilization.

I, perhaps, might venture to claim that it was a medicine for what is the most objectionable feature of our national character; and that is self-conceit,—an undue appreciation of ourselves, an exaggerated estimate of our achievements, of our inventions, of our contributions to popular comfort, and of our place, in fact, in the great procession of the ages. We seem to imagine that, whether knowledge will die with us, or not, it certainly began with us.

We have a pitying estimate, a tender compassion, for the narrowness, ignorance, and darkness of the bygone ages. We seem to ourselves not only to monopolize, but to have begun, the era of light. In other words, we are all running over with a fourth-day-of-July spirit of self-content. I am often reminded of the German whom the English poet Coleridge met at Frankfort. He always took off his hat with profound respect when he ventured to speak of himself. It seems to me, the American people might be painted in the chronic attitude of taking off its hat to itself; and therefore it can be no waste of time, with an audience in such a mood, to take their eyes for a moment from the present civilization, and guide them back to that earliest possible era that history describes for us, if it were only for the purpose of asking whether we boast on the right line. I might despair of curing the habit of boasting, but I might direct it better!

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

[1] This lecture was never revised by Mr. Phillips, and is imperfect in form and expression. But it is the best report in existence.

PROOF-READERS' MARKS AND A CORRECTED PROOF-SHEET.

Signs indicating alterations to be made in the type are placed in the margin of the proof, corresponding to marks placed where the corrections are to be made, and may be explained as follows: ⊥, push down space or quad showing with type; center, bring the opposite line to the place indicated by ⌐; #, insert space where caret (∧) is made; ⅋, take out letters or words canceled; ⅋, turn inverted letter underscored; stet, restore word or letter inadvertently canceled (literally, "let it stand"); ∨, insert apostrophe; other superior characters are similarly indicated by being placed in an inverted caret, as ∨, ∨, and for inferior characters the caret is made in its usual position, as ∧; ⊐, indent line an em; ⌐, bring matter to the left; the mark is reversed (¬) when it is desired to move matter to the right; a correction is suggested to the author by an interrogation-point, as ?; ⅋, ——, lower word or letter; to raise a word or letter the sign ¬ is used; ⊙, insert full point; change of a word or letter is indicated by a line drawn through the faulty matter, the word or letter to be substituted being written opposite in the margin; omitted words or letters are indicated in the same manner, a caret being placed where the insertion is to be made; ||, justify the lines—that is, space so that the margin will appear even and straight; +, broken letter; a logotype character is indicated by a tie, as ff; caps, change matter underlined to capitals; tr, transpose words or letters underlined; ⊂, draw together matter indicated by a similar mark in type; No ¶, run on matter without break; ⅋, a combination of ⅋ and ⊂, signifying "take out canceled character and close up"; l. c., change matter underlined to lower-case; ≡, straighten lines; rom., roman type. If too much matter has been omitted by the compositor to be conveniently written in the margin of the proof, "Out, see copy" is written, and the place for insertion indicated as shown. Other marks used above will prove practically self-explaining by reference to the corrected proof-sheet on the right

4. Math. (1) An equality or identity between ratios, especially geometrical ratios or quotients: in the latter case called also geometrical proportion, as distinguished from an equality of arithmetical ratios, or differences, which is called arithmetical proportion.

Ratio expresses the comparative value or magnitude of two quantities, usually as a quotient (geometrical ratio); proportion is the sameness of such comparative values, or quotients. Thus, the ratio of 4 to 2 is equal to the ratio of 6 to 3; therefore 4, 2, 6, and 3 are in proportion. This is expressed thus: 4:2::6:3, or 4:2 = 6:3, or $^4/_2 = {}^6/_3$. These four numbers are called the terms of the proportion. The first and fourth are the extremes, the others the means. (2) That rule of arithmetic by which, when three numbers are given, a fourth is found having the same ratio to the third as the second has to the first; the rule by which a missing term of one of two equal ratios is found. 2. Eng. Law. The written statement of some matter to a chief clerk in the Court of Chancery, pursuant to an order of court, as for the appointment of a guardian.

Synonyms: bid, offer, overture, proposition. An offer or proposal puts something before one for acceptance or rejection, proposal being the more formal word; a proposition sets forth truth (or what is claimed to be truth) in formal statement. The proposition is for consideration, the proposal for action; as, a proposition in geometry, a proposal of marriage; but proposition is often used nearly in the sense of proposal when it is a matter for deliberation; as, a proposition for the surrender of a fort. A bid is commercial and often verbal; as, a bid at an auction; proposal is used in nearly the same sense, but is more formal. An overture opens negotiation or conference, and the word is especially used of some movement toward reconciliation; as, overtures of peace.—Antonyms: acceptance, decision, denial, refusal, rejection.

Synonyms: purpose. In its most frequent use, propose differs from purpose in that what we purpose lies in our own mind, as a decisive act of will, a determination; what we propose is offered or stated to others. In this use of the word, what we propose is open to deliberation, as what we purpose is not. In another use of the word one proposes something to or by himself which may or may not be stated to others. In this latter sense propose is nearly identical with purpose, and the two words have often been used interchangeably. But in the majority of cases what we purpose is more general, what we propose more formal and definite; I purpose to do right; I propose to do this specific thing because it is right. In the historic sentence "I propose to move immediately on your works," purpose would not have the same sharp directness.

pro′to-plasm, prō′to-plazm, n. Biol. The viscid, contractile, semi-liquid, more or less granular substance that forms the principal portion of an animal or vegetable cell; sarcode.

The name was first applied in 1846 to the matter in vegetable cells, which was identified later with the animal substance previously known as sarcode. The protoplasm of most cells appears under high powers of the microscope as a network (spongioplasm or reticulum) containing a more fluid substance (hyaloplasm or enchylema) in its meshes. Chemically it is a mixture of 40 to 85 per cent. water and 15 to 20 per cent. solids, chiefly proteids, as albumoses, globulins, and peptones, with small quantities of fat, carbohydrates like glycogen and inosite, and mineral salts, especially those of potassium, which cause it to yield an alkaline reaction. Protoplasm has been called by Huxley, owing to its presence in all organized bodies, the "physical basis of life," and some have held that its phenomena show that the difference between organized and unorganized matter is simply a difference of complexity of chemical constitution.

It is a fact of great biological interest that in animals the essential constituent of all living parts is a substance similar to the protoplasm of plants. We cannot distinguish the two by any chemical or physical tests, and can only say that, taken as a whole, the protoplasm of plants differs from that of animals in its secretions. C. E. BESSEY Botany ¶ 1, p. 1. [H. H. & CO. '89.]

The movement of living protoplasm must be classed with muscular and ciliary movement, with which it is closely connected by numerous transitional forms, as phenomena of contractility.

pseu'do-morph, siū'do-mȫrf, n. 1. Mineral. A mineral having the external crystalline form of another mineral.

Pseudomorphs result from alteration through chemical change, as by loss, addition, or exchange of constituents; by molecular change (paramorphs); by substitution, either partial or total, as when the original crystal is dissolved out and the cavity filled by other material; also, by superficial incrustation. Luster is often absent or dull, and the hardness different from that of the mineral simulated in form. 2. An irregular or false form. [< PSEUDO- + Gr. morphē, form.]

In Wheatstone's pseudoscope, the ordinary visual relations between the near and the distant parts of an object are reversed. . . . so that a convex figure becomes a concave one, an impression of a seal resembles the seal itself, a bust seen in front appears as a hollow mask.
G. F. BARKER Physics ¶ 431, p. 486. [H.H. & CO. '92.]

— pseu"do-scop'ic, a. Of or pertaining to the pseudoscope; causing or characterized by error or delusion in the perception of the relief of solid objects. pseu"do-scop'ic-al‡. — pseu"do-scop'ic-al-ly, adv.

A Pseudoscope.

Rays from a, b, and c reach the points a', b', c', on the retina of the left eye, and a², b², c², on that of the right eye. In natural vision the optic axes must be converged more to look at b than at a or c, hence the observer knows that b is nearer and that the object is convex; but the prisms reverse the order of the rays, so that those which reach the retinas at b' and b² make a smaller angle than those at a' and a² or c' and c². Less convergence of the optic axes is therefore required to observe b than a or c; b appears farther away, and the surface looks concave.

Many of the phenomena to be investigated seem to lie in the dim borderland between the spirit and the body, or, if there be no such neutral zone, in the territory where they overlap and mingle, a region hitherto occupied only by the savage hordes of superstition, imposture, and quackery. Psychology was formerly known variously as intellectual, mental, or even moral philosophy, metaphysics, etc., but since it has been generally acknowledged that there can be a true inductive science of the mind, the present name or its equivalent, mental science, has come into use. Psychologists may be divided into three schools, of which the first two endeavor to avoid the use of the human consciousness as the instrument of observation as well as its object. They are (1) mental physiologists, cerebralists, and psychophysicists, who base the science on physiological facts observed by means of the senses, including phrenologists, who study the skull alone; (2) transcendental psychologists, who, returning to the old scholastic method, and avoiding appeals to either the senses or consciousness, base the science on a priori assumptions; and (3) eclectics, psychologists, who obtain the laws of the science by induction from observation by consciousness itself. The objects of this observation are (1) the facts of consciousness, including those resulting from the relations of mind and body and of mind to external nature; (2) the faculties and susceptibilities to which they may be referred; and (3) the ego as given in consciousness and endowed with faculties. See MIND, and phrases below.

Psychology is a science. It professes to exhibit what is actually known or may be learned concerning the soul, in the forms of science — i. e., in the forms of exact observation, precise definition, fixed terminology, classified arrangement, and rational explanation. PORTER Human Intellect § 2, p. 1. [S. '70.]

With the understanding that the statement is only provisional, we define psychology as the science which describes and explains the phenomena of consciousness, as such. G. T. LADD Psychology: Descriptive and Explanatory p. 1. [S. '94.]

Psychology may be conceived in two ways: either as the science of the soul — this is the old conception — or as the science of psychic phenomena — this is the new conception. RIBOT German Psychol. of Today tr. by J. M. Baldwin, ch. 8, p. 295. [S. '85.]

Besides neurology in general, it has special reference to sensation, including psychophysics and psychometry, and deals also with psychophysical aspects of the various mental powers. — rational p., psychology that seeks to account for the facts of consciousness by underlying principles, or that derives such facts a priori from the concept of the soul. — the new p., psychology studied experimentally rather than deductively; psychophysics in its strict sense.

The apparatus having been primed, admission of steam to one chamber forces the liquid into the delivery-pipe until the increasing area of the surface in contact with the steam condenses the latter and causes a vacuum, which causes the inlet-valve to shut off the steam from that side of the apparatus and admit it to the other. More liquid then rushes in to fill the vacuum while the other side is discharging, and so on in alternation.

pyr′a-mid, pir′ą-mid, n. 1. A solid structure of masonry, in the most notable examples made of stone, generally with a square base, and with triangular sides meeting in an apex.

The pyramids of Egypt, raised over the sepulchral chambers of kings, are the best examples of this type of structure. The most interesting group is at Ghizeh, near Cairo. The Great Pyramid, reared above the tomb of Cheops, and counted one of the seven wonders of the world, was originally 481 feet high, and its base 756 feet square. The exactness of its orientation and the fact that the ratio of its height to the perimeter of its base is as nearly as possible that of the diameter of a circle to its circumference (see PI), with other structural peculiarities, have led many to believe that it was built as an astronomical observatory, as a permanent record of certain geometrical facts, or as a metrological standard. Other forms of the pyramid are found in Greece, Italy, Mexico, China, India, and Assyria.

The derivation of this word has long puzzled philologists. The Egyptian word designating the pyramid in the Mathematical Papyrus of the British Museum reads 'abemer'; but the name given to a side of the figure ▲ is written 'peremus,' a word which is clearly the original of the Greek 'pyramis.' The actual meaning of this hieroglyphic group has only been determined within the last eight years by Prof. E. Revillout, when analysing the above-named 'Mathematical Papyrus,' in which it is explained that the word 'Peremus' signifies 'going forth from the large'; 'large' in this sense meaning the superficial extent of the base of a building. When applied to a pyramid, it means the base, or square, of the structure. A line vertically elevated from the center of this square 'going forth,' that is to say, 'from the large' — would give the dimensions, and accurately define all the measurements, of the structure, this being the line which governed the construction of the pyramid. Q

Q q Q q Q q
Roman. Black Letter. Script.

Q, q, kiū, n. [QUES, Q's, or Qs, kiūz, pl.] 1. A letter: the seventeenth in the English alphabet; in Bell's "Visible Speech," ○; retained as the first member of the consonant digraph qu, = Anglo-Saxon cw = Germanic kw, "Visible Speech" ○ ∋, the sign of back tongue-opening combined with lip-opening, as in quart, queen.

The positions and movements of the organs in making this diphthong are described under the letters C = K and W. In many words qu is a modification of an early k by a sympathetic movement of the lips: Greek kw, Latin quis, who, analogous to the modification by a tongue-movement described under C= Cicero = kikero > tsitsitsero. Parent Speech or Early Latin qu is regularly represented in East Germanic languages by hw: Latin quod, Anglo-Saxon hwat, what. This is an unstable combination, one or the other letter dropping, especially between two vowels. The u = w drops oftenest in Romanic words (Latin quinque > French cinq, five), the c or h in Germanic (German was, what), so that c, q, h and w seem to interchange in words from roots containing this diphthong. French qu often stands for cu in which silent u is inserted to show that the k sound is preserved: pique < pic, pick, banque, bank, a spelling much affected in English at times, masque, SHAKESPEARE, cheque, and the like.

Most of the qu's in English are late borrowings from Latin or French. The sound was represented by cw in Anglo-Saxon. But when c became ambiguous in Middle English, qu took the place of cw initial, as in cwēn, queen; cwic, quick, etc. It is also used as a variant of wh in some early dialects: qhilk, which, and in modern English in many new or respelled words.

In the pronunciation of this Dictionary cw is used regularly for qu in English words having that sound. Qu is sometimes parted in English pronunciation: eq′uity; u is often silent: risque, piquant, as in French. In transliterations of Hebrew, and other strange alphabets, q is sometimes used alone to denote a more guttural k or other strange guttural sound.

Capital Q is from Latin Ǫ (which some of the Romans thought a ligature of Cv; Latin C is sometimes used alone for cv) < Greek Ϙ, koppa (used in classic Greek only as a numeral; Gothic has a similar single sign for hw), < Phenician Ϥ which was the sign of a more guttural back vowel than k, < Egyptian hieratic 𓎛 < hieroglyphic 𓄿. The hieroglyph represents an angle or knee and the Semitic name koph means the same. qu is Latin. For lower case, black letter, and dates, see A.

The history of the characters is represented as follows:

Hieroglyphic Knee. Egyptian Hieratic. Phenician. Early Greek. Roman. English Script.
